Down In The Trenches

Another Busy Summer for Aquarion Work Crews

The water pipes and the rest of the complex infrastructure on which your water service depends are designed to last decades. But, like so many other things, they eventually need replacement.

That's why this summer you may be seeing roadside crews working on projects to improve and upgrade our infrastructure. With hundreds of thousands of customers in dozens of towns and cities across Connecticut, it's a never-ending job to maintain the water mains, storage tanks, treatment plants and pumping stations that Aquarion quality and service depend upon.

When you drive by our crews, please remember to slow down and stay alert. Their safety is critical to us. We need your help to protect them as they work diligently to maintain and improve water infrastructure in your town.

Meanwhile, we'll continue working with your local police and department of public works to minimize any inconvenience these projects may cause – and bring you decades more of just a faucet turn away from high-quality water, whenever you want it.

For the latest on our ongoing projects, including some that may be underway near your home, head for www.aquarionwater.com/projects.

Did You Know?

Most U.S. public water systems use small amounts of chlorine to eliminate potentially harmful parasites, bacteria and viruses. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention consider drinking water chlorination to be one of the ten greatest public health achievements of the 20th century. Most Aquarion systems are treated with chlorine, and we're working to add that treatment level to all remaining unchlorinated systems.
